Paperback. Book Condition: New. Paperback. 148 pages. The novel opens with the thoughts of our main character, one isolated American man. Sitting here, not so bad, the last white man in Flushing, not so bad. Being here, in this apartment, not so bad. Noise, yes, but can live with that, I think. Not so bad. But, probably, cause I keep saying, not so bad, you really think it is, bad that is. Maybe I should say something like its tolerable. Thats right, tolerable in Flushing, the last white male living, a foreigner in my own neighborhood, isolated from all. Flushing tolerable, historical, established in the seventeenth century by the Dutch Never know it if you looked at Flushing today with its Asian Pagodas and signs in Korean and Chinese - fascinating place, especially for me, a writer. Asians today, Dutch yesterday. Who tomorrow Reminds me, Asians. Mysterious. Keep to themselves, quiet and shrewd. Cant relate. Why bother At fifty, its no big deal anymore. Closer to the grave than to life Just leave me alone. Our character is angry: Weekday mornings in Flushing, like the world, the sun rising, day starting, humans getting up, washing and clothing bodies, sticking things in mouths, taking a dump, splashing perfumes over deteriorating bodies, and rushing to the modern work place. Friday, this day, the end of the work week. Going, through it, stopping off at the Korean diner for breakfast, walking towards the Flushing, train station, hating it, pig-sties everywhere. Asians, filthy. Walking, smells, fish and fruit stores in the middle of Main Street. Dont watch where theyre going. Where did they come from Their own countries, where Hate. Insects, littering, building golden pagodas, planting signs in Chinese and Korean lettering. Walking towards a train station. Daily ritual. A community gone mad. A...
